Season 3 Is Back!

Friends,

As many of you know, we suspended Season 3 of our podcast earlier this year to create two special series: Stories from a Pandemic and Black Voices in Healthcare. We know the conversations surrounding these important topics are far from over, and we are committed to integrating them into our programming moving forward. In the meantime, however, we are excited to announce that we are launching the remaining four "classic" Nocturnists episodes of Season 3!
Our first, "Not Cut Out for This," by medical student Latha Panchap, is out today - you can listen here.

In other exciting news, Emily was recently featured on an episode of Home Base Nation podcast, where she took part in a fascinating conversation entitled "Prescribing Your Narrative." You can listen to the episode here.

Emily was also in conversation with Laurel Braitman, Stanford's Writer-in-Residence, as part of the Bay Area Science Festival. They had a wonderful conversation about the importance of storytelling in medicine, especially in 2020. Check out the video here.

Lastly, as we head into this unusual holiday season, we are reminded of all we have to be grateful for - our listeners, our supporters, and the power of stories, to name a few. If you would like to support our mission this Giving Tuesday, please consider making a contribution to The Nocturnists here. Every bit counts.

With love,
The Nocturnists

Season 3 Ep 8: Not Cut Out for This
Medical student Latha Panchap shares a story about a crisis of confidence on the wards. Latha was the winner of The Nocturnists' medical student storytelling contest on the theme of learning, and told her story in front of a live audience at the Housing Works Bookstore and Cafe in NYC on December 19, 2019.
